has business been dull at this store, and what's more, it won't be. We are making prices that people with cash cannot resist. This week we have put up sixty camping and prospecting orders, and they were not small ones. Just let us figure on your bill, is all we ask. July must be a hummer for business and we will pay you to help us make it a record breaker. We are simply setting things afire on New Crop Teas, in which we have largest stock in Arizona at

ABOUT BILLIARDS

A Chinaman's Explanation of That Popular Game.

A gentleman who is visiting the city dropped into the Martine club on Saturday to play a little game of billiards with a friend. An incident in the course of the game reminded him of a circumstance that transpired in one of the San Francisco clubs not long ago and he related it. It illustrates how quick a novice can catch on to some features of the game even if he cannot play much.

A Chinaman who was employed around the club in a menial capacity happened to pass through the billiard room just as the gentleman telling the story and a friend were reaching the critical point in a game. One of the gentlemen asked the Chinaman if he understood the game, when the following dialogue ensued:

"Me sabe billiards? "Yes; me heap sabe."

"Is that so? Well, tell us about the game, will you?"

"Allite, I sabe, I tell you. Billiards heap fine game. One man he say 'Hard lines'; nuther man he say 'Dam!'"

A HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEY

In Which the County and Uncle Sam Are Partners.

Mr. Arthur P. Davis, chief of the hydrographic survey, submitted a proposition to the water storage commission which has accepted it. The proposition is that the government will spend $2000 on a hydrographic survey of the Salt river and its tributaries if the county or the commission will spend a like amount. The county funds for the use of the commission are not yet available, but the government's part will be expended first and that will carry the work beyond the first of next year, when the county's money will be ready. The work involves a survey of the watersheds of the Salt and all its tributaries, including a similar survey of the Verde. There will be careful measurements of the waters of both streams covering a period of several months. The question of silt deposits will be fully gone into and in the end all the disputes which have divided the irrigationists of this valley for several years will be fully settled. There need after that be no more talk of talk and theoretical discussions like those which have dissipated valuable time and money within the last year. The people will know what a reservoir will cost, what can be done with it and whether they want it.

The survey will be supervised by Mr. Davis and will be begun as soon as possible. He is now on his way north to direct government surveys made in several places. When they have been finished he will go to Washington, and as soon as he can thereafter he will return to Phoenix.

TRIAL BY THEIR PEERS.

People Exempt From the Jurisdiction of Ordinary Tribunals.

There are in the old world a large number of individuals who by virtue of old time prerogatives, conceded to the class to which they belong, enjoy exemption from the jurisdiction of ordinary tribunals. In Austria and in Spain, for instance, the Knights of the Order of the Golden Fleece have the right of demanding trial by the chapter of the order, and immunity from all other legal procedure. In Austria suits against members of the reigning house can only be dealt with by a tribunal presided over by the minister of the imperial house, or any one whom he may delegate for the purpose; a court the verdict of which must be approved by the sovereign in order to become effective. It was owing to the fact of Princess Philip of Coburg, daughter of the king of the Belgians, being regarded as belonging to the court of Austria that she was exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals three years ago, and that the charges of fraud and forgery brought against her by Austrian and foreign tradespeople, and bill discounters were referred to the "Hofmarschallamtsgericht," or imperial court, presided over by the minister of the imperial house, jointly with the lord high steward of the court, which declared her mentally irresponsible, and thus acquitted her of all criminal intent.

In Germany the members of the so-called mediatorial families to the emperor of which Part II of the "Almanach de Gotha" is devoted, were altogether exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals of the land until 1878 (even when engaged in legal disputes with persons who did not belong to their caste), and were only subject to a tribunal of their peers, specially organized for the occasion. And, although since that time they have to a great extent been assimilated to the ordinary citizen in legal matters, yet they still retain a large number of legal prerogatives and immunities. For instance, they are not obliged to take the ordinary form of oath in court, their mere word being held to be sufficient; they can demand trial by the supreme court, instead of by tribunals of inferior rank; and in matters which concern offenses not against the commonwealth, the state or against common law, but merely against the family to which they belong, as well as in family disputes about property and the guardianship of minors, spendthrifts and lunatics, the issues are dealt with by a special tribunal composed of the magnates of the family, the decisions of which are subsequently ratified and enforced by the supreme court. It should be explained that the heads of these mediatorial houses, some of them dukes, some princes, others merely marquises and counts, formerly enjoyed the rank and power of petty sovereigns, vassals, however, to his apostolic majesty the emperor of the holy Roman empire. The Napoleonic wars swept the majority of these small states away, and the treaty of Vienna set its goal to their disappearance. It was felt, however, at the time of the congress of Vienna, that these dispossessed petty sovereigns required some sort of compensation for the loss of their dominions, as well as a balm for their wounded pride. Accordingly, they and their lineal descendants were invested with a number of extraordinary privileges, similar to those enjoyed to this day by princes and princesses of reigning dynasties, and which served to distinguish them from the ordinary nobles of the land. Among the prerogatives were exemptions from taxation, from the jurisdiction of ordinary tribunals and from obligatory military service. Little by little they are being deprived of these immunities, which, where not entirely abolished, are at any rate modified. Thus, although the scions of the mediatorial houses are now brought within the scope of the law of obligatory military service, they enter the army as officers without having to go through the ordinary procedure to secure a commission.

In France, Italy, Spain, Portugal and several other European countries the same serves as a tribunal for the trial of offenses of a treasonable character against the state, and likewise in cases of crimes against common law, where the offenders are cabinet ministers, great dignitaries of the state or members of the senate. Thus in France a man who has the Grand Cross of the National Order of the Legion of Honor can demand exemption from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law, and trial by the senate sitting as the supreme tribunal of the land, no matter what his offense, and the French senate has just passed judgment upon Count de Launay, who was charged with partaking in a royalist conspiracy having for its object the overthrow of

In England all the members of the royal household and the officials of the royal court, no matter what their degree, are subject to a special tribunal, known as the Board of Green Cloth, which has likewise exclusive jurisdiction in the case of all offenses committed within the precincts of the royal palaces and the gardens, grounds and parks connected therewith. The Board of Green Cloth, composed of several high dignitaries of the household, is presided over by the lord steward of the household, who has the power to delegate to any judge or magistrate his authority to deal, in the name of the board, with offenses that would legally be dealt with by the ordinary courts. There is, for instance, the tribunal to which cases may be carried on appeal from the supreme court, and which is composed of what is known as the law lords, that is to say, of peers who have occupied seats on the bench, or who are still regular members of the high court of judicature. But no lay or spiritual peers have anything to do with this tribunal, which has jurisdiction only in the United Kingdom, the throne only in the United Kingdom, the throne only in the United Kingdom.

Besides the Board of Green Cloth, there is the house of lords, which is called upon to serve as a tribunal in a number of special cases. Strictly speaking, there are two separate tribunals known as the house of lords. There is, for instance, the tribunal to which cases may be carried on appeal from the supreme court, and which is composed of what is known as the law lords, that is to say, of peers who have occupied seats on the bench, or who are still regular members of the high court of judicature. But no lay or spiritual peers have anything to do with this tribunal, which has jurisdiction only in the United Kingdom, the throne only in the United Kingdom, the throne only in the United Kingdom.

"pas" over everyone else in the realm, preceding even the lord high chancellor and the premier, as well as all dukes, yet were he to render himself guilty of a felony he could not claim trial by the house of lords, but would be amenable to the ordinary courts of law, as are, indeed, all other archbishops and bishops.

It should be understood that it is only in cases of treason, "misprision" and felony that peers and princesses are entitled to trial by the house of lords. For minor offenses they are subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law, and it is a moot question as to whether peers who are bankrupt, and who, through their failure to secure a discharge in bankruptcy, are temporarily deprived of their prerogatives as hereditary legislators, can claim trial by the house of lords. Thus were, for instance, the young duke of Manchester to become involved in any scrape entailing charges of felony or "misprision," it is probable that he would be debarred from the right of trial by the house of lords, owing to the fact of his being an undischarged bankrupt.

There seems to be an impression that in the event of parliament not being in session, the lord high steward of the realm can form a court at his own discretion, by choosing whomsoever he pleases from the house of lords. But this is not the case. For a law passed some two hundred years ago renders it obligatory upon the lord high steward, in the event of parliament being prorogued at the time of the trial, to "summon all the peers who have a right to sit and vote in parliament."

There is no lord high steward at present, and it will be the duty of King Edward to issue a commission appointing one to preside at the trial of Earl Russell. Judging by precedent, he will probably nominate the lord high chancellor, who will, however, only exercise his office as high steward, and grand seneschal of the realm while the trial lasts, and will break his white wand of office as such as soon as the trial is brought to a close, and the house of lords has decided by a majority of one the Earl Russell is guilty or not of the felony known as bigamy.

But will the Earl demand trial by his peers? Or can he legally insist on being tried by the ordinary courts? The latter is a question which has never yet been determined, most legal authorities holding that he must be tried by the house of lords, whether he wishes it or not.—"Ex-Attache" in New York Tribune.
